10a. Recognises the opportunities and challenges related to the digitisation of industry; notes the positive effects that the digitisation of industry has as it increases flexible working arrangements that can create a better work-life balance, diversify choices through mobile telework, and allow people from rural and isolated areas to join the labour market (provided they are equipped with the necessary infrastructure), thereby fostering economic growth; recognises, at the same time, that the digitisation-driven trend towards increased flexibility may increase the danger of unstable and precarious employment; stresses that new forms of work must not be used to circumvent existing labour and social legislation as regards the protection of workers' and consumer rights; points out that traditional industries and businesses in the platform economy must be on an equal footing;

Motion for a resolutionParagraph 22 a (new)Motion for a resolutionAmendment*

22a. Highlights that besides the many positive aspects that digitisation can have for society and the economy, it can also potentially increase the digital divide between larger players and SMEs, between urban and rural areas, between different Member States, between different sectors and between employees who are better able to adapt to a continuing digitisation of industry and those who are not; asks the Commission to closely monitor such developments and to enter into a permanent dialogue with social partners and other relevant stakeholders on possible corrective measures;
