Subject: Implications of the Paris attacks for security policy

The Islamist terror attack in Paris has demonstrated the proportions which have now been assumed by the danger of terrorism, and the fact that, despite intensive observation of potential terrorists, the security authorities are hardly capable of guaranteeing the safety of members of the public. The German security authorities consider there to be 'a high risk of terrorism, in the abstract, in Germany'.

1. What security policy measures will the Commission initiate in order, in future, to effectively prevent attacks such as that in Paris?
2. In what towns and cities within the EU are Islamists or jihadists living who have returned to Europe in the past 24 months after participating in the civil war in Syria or Iraq?
