Subject: The Council striving to be representative of the citizens of Europe

The Commission has previously stated that it 'strives to be representative of the increasingly diverse European citizens it serves' (in response to Written Questions E-008102/14, E-007850/14 and E-007851/14).

Does the Commission's view mirror that of the Council?

In what ways is the Council striving to be representative of European citizens, who are increasingly diverse?

Could the Council provide 10 practical examples of such efforts?
