Subject: Commission measures against the Islamist terror threat

Recently the threat to Europe from an aggressive form of Islam has taken on new, concrete forms. It is now no longer simply a potential, but, as the recent attacks in Paris and Copenhagen show, a very real threat to Europe's citizens. Recently the Islamist terror organisation, the 'Islamic State', which has in the meantime also obtained a foothold in Libya, announced that they would drive 500 000 refugees over the Mediterranean Sea and would infiltrate Europe using terrorists among these refugees. Rome was named as a concrete target¹.

1. How and using which concrete measures does the Commission intend to react to this new type of threat to Europe of organised Islamist terror?
2. How does the Commission intend to effectively keep control of/keep away from the territories of the EU the flow of refugees across the Mediterranean used by the 'Islamic State' as a concrete way of destabilising Europe?
3. What role is foreseen by the Commission as regards points 1 and 2 for the European border patrol agency Frontex? Which steps will the Commission possibly undertake to enable Frontex to efficiently re-secure the European external borders again, especially against terrorist threats?
