Subject: EU position in relation to the new framework for relations between countries in the Americas

In recent months there have been significant developments in relations between countries on the American continent, especially those concerning the rapprochement between Cuba and the United States.

This is opening up a new phase on that continent and is also creating a new situation in relation to which the European Union cannot remain impassive.

What is the Commission's view on this improvement of relations between the countries of North and South America?

What will be the EU position with regard to this change in international relations?

What is the EU position regarding Cuba, more specifically?
