

Question for written answer E-008780/2015
to the Commission
Rule 130
Doru-Claudian Frunzuliță (S&D)

Subject: Integration of immigrants

Integrating immigrants, allowing them to participate in the host society at the same level as natives, is an active – not a passive – process that involves two parties, the host society and the immigrants, working together to build a cohesive society. Policy-making on integration is commonly regarded as a matter primarily of concern to the receiving state, with little thought given to the role of the sending state.

How can the Commission make the sending states more responsible, or involve them more in the education of the population in order to foster a better understanding of the European culture and system?