Subject: Re-use of public sector data containing personal data - continuation of question E-1142/18

Following on from parliamentary question E-001142-18, I would like to ask the following.

The national legislator based its decision and the establishment of public registers on the fact that, in relation to the specific category of personal data, the right to information took precedence over the right to privacy of the persons concerned. As no relationship exists between the operators and the persons concerned and as the special categories of personal data are not being processed, can legitimate interest be invoked as the legal basis for re-use of the personal data, and can the reasons and purposes for publishing the data include, for example, greater transparency in public administration, checks on the efficiency of public spending or publication for the purposes of fraud prevention?

Can national legislation lay down rules for the re-use and/or integration of the personal data under the previous question where a non-profit entity does not have specific legally-imposed tasks in the public interest?
