Justification

Registration of political parties and foundations is a complex process requiring assessment of numerous factual and legal aspects, touching upon fundamental right of freedom of political assembly. Decisions concerning registration may be subject to judicial appeal. However, given their immediate effect and importance, they must meet high legal standard. The present draft of the regulation does not take this into account. Similarly, present draft does not establish clear criteria for members of eminent persons committee.

In order for such interference to be compatible with the EU Fundamental Rights Charter, it must be legitimate and proportionate. Annual verification (as currently foreseen in the draft regulation) does not seem to be proportionate. Justification

According to the well-established case-law of the European Court of Human Rights political parties programme and statute may not be the only basis for assessing the party's activities. In order to effectively assess practical compliance of a political party with the criteria laid down in the regulation, it is necessary to collect background information (sometimes including sensitive information) on the party's activities. In performing this task, exchange of information with national authorities is crucial, given that the national authorities have closer and more direct contact with the political parties operating on their territory.
