to the Commission
Rule 138
Ciarán Cuffe (Verts/ALE)

Subject: Encouraging public transport use for young people and the elderly

Increasing the ability of citizens to use active and public transport modes is crucial for tackling transport-related emissions and improving quality of life. Young people and the elderly often require extra support to be able to make full use of public transport systems, particularly as they have been hit hard by the cost of living crisis.

1. Does the Commission have data on the availability of extra support measures, such as subsidies or discounted fares, in each Member State for young people and the elderly for accessing public transport?
2. Does the Commission collect data on the use of public transport systems by these groups of people in society (young people and the elderly)?
