Subject: Citizens' rights during summit meetings

According to the Swedish media, inhabitants of Gothenburg living close to where the European Summit is to be held have had their names placed on a register by the police and have been asked to give details of any guests they are planning to have around the time of, or during, the summit.

Does the Council consider that such action respects the integrity of European citizens, and is this the usual practice in the case of European summits wherever they are held in the Member States?
