A. whereas the Union requires a new industrial strategy that makes its industries more globally competitive, resilient and environmentally sustainable; whereas such a strategy should cover the transition of European industries to digitalisation and climate-neutrality, prioritising the ‘energy efficiency first’ principles, energy savings and renewable energy technologies;

Amendment

A. whereas the Union requires a new industrial strategy that renders its industries more globally competitive, resilient and in line with the 1.5 degree temperature goal of the Paris Agreement and the European Green Deal; whereas such strategy needs to ensure the transition to a modern, digitalised, fully renewables based, highly energy- and resource-efficient, net-zero GHG emission European industrial base by 2040 at the latest; whereas focus needs to be put on the energy efficiency first principles, energy and resource savings, renewable energy technologies, circularity and a non-toxic environment, while maintaining and developing international competitiveness and avoiding the delocalisation of European industries; whereas industrial competitiveness and climate policy are mutually reinforcing and innovative and climate-neutral reindustrialisation will create local jobs and ensure the competitiveness of the European economy;

1a. \textit{Recommends the Commission to evaluate role as accelerator of the transition of the European production capacity and competitiveness to the new industrial era by introducing policy propositions that focus on both the supply side and the demand side of technology; Underlines that the EU institutions, and especially the EC should enhance its activities in supporting marketable innovation (supply side), however taking into account that it has to become more disciplined in terms of technology transfer channels from the lab to the market, specifying relevant key performance indicators when the EU budget is employed to support industrial innovation projects; Underscores that significant engagement in actions that boost the demand side for industrial innovation are also critical for the success of any EU industrial policy and strongly recommends the development of a policy that will incentivize the engagement of the industrial organizations and firms, especially the legacy sectors, into the functions of innovation ecosystems;}

1a. Is of the opinion that digital and environmental transitions should be at the very core of all Unions strategies until 2050; in this context, calls on the Commission to define a comprehensive industrial strategy which manages these transitions, fosters transformation and guarantees the Union’s strategic autonomy and recognition and encouragement of sector-specific ‘first movers’ who act as role models of innovation and agile business development;

Paragraph 1 b (new)

1b. Recommends the Commission to structure a strategy that enhances the role of the European Digital Innovation Hubs and the existing innovation ecosystems in Europe in the value chain of the EU industries; Advises the need to create a strategy that explores the optimal position of the European industrial transformation in the continuum between in-house innovation and open innovation; Is of the opinion that indiscriminate adoption of open innovation schemes is not necessarily in line with the global competitive interests of the EU and suggests a scheme of open innovation but within European innovation ecosystems. In the same line, recommends the design of an innovation strategy for major corporations, mid-caps and SMEs, that will link the European firms with technology providers, and especially start-ups;

1c. Advises the Commission to boost both the quantity and the quality of innovation and technology in the European Industries that is generated and transmitted by the European start-ups, by defining start-ups distinctly from the

Id. Recommends the Commission to design a comprehensive strategy of infrastructure investments in the area of 5G/6G, cyber security and IIoT, that will enable the swift scaling and transition of the European industries to the new industrial era; Stresses the strategic importance of a European cloud as well as the need for agile data storage and management alternatives to cloud, such as edge, fog and mist computing capabilities; Suggests the further capacity development of a European semiconductors market, because, as it is possible to design the intended policy of data control, interoperability and security of interconnected machines into the silicon chip, then a European capacity in this industrial sector is strategic in terms of the global competitive position of the Union;

If. Believes that the Commission and the other EU institutions have a strong capacity in developing and using innovative and emerging technologies and test them before trickling them down to the European industries through use cases; This role of the EU institutions is instrumental in experimenting with the technology before putting it into use in the private and public value chains; The EU institutions in general, and the EC in particular, should continue playing the instrumental role they now play in funding innovation partners (such as universities and research institutions) and continue using innovative technologies; However it is necessary to do so through mechanisms that mitigate the financial, technological, operational and reputational risks that now are concentrated; The EC should structure KPIs, quality standards and risk sharing mechanisms in its procurement policy as well as to develop the legal and budgetary framework that will allow its connection with innovation ecosystems; The funding of useful to industry technologies with the EU budget should produce marketable solutions and patents when possible, and royalties of these patents should be payed to the EU when the commercialization of the product is profitable in order the EU to use these proceedings for further investments in Research and Development;

Paragraph 2

2. Calls for an inclusive industrial strategy that include all industrial ecosystems, SMEs, regions, communities and workers in its development and its implementation; is aware that market dynamics alone do not bridge the fractures created during the transformation process if there is no proper management of the transitions and no strong industrial policies; is, furthermore, aware that while markets, competition and innovation push fast towards transformation, it is society and the environment that face the impact of these transformations; considers that balancing out the number of jobs lost in traditional industries with new jobs created in the digital and environmental sectors is not enough in itself as these new jobs are neither created in the same regions nor taken up by the same workers; calls on the Commission, therefore, to ensure that these transitions are fair and socially just, and that every action aimed at accelerating a transformation process (digital, environmental, etc.) is accompanied by a corresponding initiative to up-skill and reskill workers, with the aim of managing the effects produced by that accelerated process on both regions and people; and the environment that face the impact of these transformations; considers that balancing out the number of jobs lost in traditional industries with new jobs created in the digital and environmental sectors is not enough in itself as these new jobs are neither created in the same regions nor taken up by the same workers; calls on the Commission, therefore, to ensure that European production of essential products such as emission-intensive materials is transformed into a cleaner alternative rather than replaced by imports of the same products and that these transitions are fair and socially just, go hand-in-hand with the full implementation of the European Pillar of Social Rights, improved social and living standards and good working conditions, and that every action aimed at accelerating a transformation process (digital, environmental, etc.) is accompanied by a corresponding initiative to up-skill and reskill workers, with the aim of managing the effects produced by that accelerated process on both regions and the most vulnerable people; calls on the Commission and the Member States to anticipate and map the industry needs for skilled labour in order to deliver skills strategies that overcome labour demand and supply mismatch, to develop knowledge-based economy that empowers citizens to adapt and accelerate the digital and environmental transition; call on the Commission to make full use of and increase the amounts allocated to the European Globalisation Adjustment Fund to financially support workers made redundant, as a result of restructuring due to Covid19 or due to the digital and environmental transformations, in their retraining, re-skilling and reintegration into the labour market in sectors of the future;

Paragraph 5 a (new)

5a. Underlines that there are specific attributes that make the transition to a net-zero GHG emission economy particularly suited to recovery measures that seek to quickly boost consumer demand and employment; highlights that evidence conveys that green sustainable projects create more jobs, deliver higher short-term returns per euro spend and lead to increased long-term cost savings in comparison with traditional fiscal stimulus, since they are quick to scale up as the technology is readily available (e.g. renewables), they tend to involve SMEs and foster local economies through strong employment effects, so quickly increase disposable income of consumers (e.g. energy efficiency), and they are less exposed to external shocks and thus contribute to a more resilient social and economic recovery; stresses that ‘green’ is to be defined in compliance with the EU taxonomy, while all funding should be aligned with the principles and the 1.5 temperature goals of the Paris agreement and ensure that no significant harm is done to environmental or social objectives;
