Amendment

105. Points out, nevertheless, that as of December 2015 the unemployment rates in the European Union and the Euro Area stood at 9% and 10.4% respectively, whilst the youth unemployment rate across all the Member States stood at 19.7%; stresses that such levels are still too high, whilst at the same time a number of studies have found a short-term negative link between immigration and the native workers' unemployment levels; further stresses that current studies about the impact on unemployment levels caused by immigration may be too optimistic as they rely on a small sample whereas the current levels of immigration to the EU are unprecedented;

Calls for the creation of a EU Job Search visa, within the framework of the legal migration package to be presented by the Commission, which would be a visa granted to specific categories of potential labour migrants for a certain period (six months) to look for a job in the whole European Union; underlines that this system could be modulated so as to apply it only to certain occupations or professions (depending on EU labour market needs), and that the beneficiary should leave EU territory, were he or she not to get a job offer or work period within the time given by the visa; suggests that another version of this system could be the development of an EU-wide traineeship for third-country nationals, either already living in the EU (such as foreign students) or not, which would grant them a temporary work permit for the period of traineeship plus some additional months in order to be able to look for a job; believes these mechanisms should be accompanied by comprehensive information campaigns in the countries of origin on the real opportunities to find employment and vocational training in the EU;
