Subject: A common initiative for peace, stability and democracy in the entire Middle East region

On several recent occasions, European and USA political representatives have stressed the need for a broader approach to the situation in the entire Middle East region, notably after the Iraq war, the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the tensions generated by religious, cultural, social and economic factors.

Although different views of the problems exist and different solutions are also envisaged, all parties agree that one cannot tolerate this status quo any longer.

In this framework, it would be advisable to start a process in which the EU, NATO, the Arab League and all other countries of the region should participate, with the aim, as suggested by the German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, of reaching a 'Declaration on a common future' addressed to the entire Middle East region.

Such an initiative could be consolidated through one or more treaties based on: peace and security; arms control and disarmament; respect for human rights, democracy and economic co-operation.

The EU, through the Barcelona Process and other cooperation agreements with countries of the Middle East region as well as its Wider Europe strategy with its Eastern and Southern neighbours, has a large set of instruments to re-launch their efforts in this context. NATO is also able to participate in such an initiative, through its partnership arrangements with some Mediterranean countries.

What is the Commission's view of these proposals?

What could the Commission contribute in terms of concrete programmes and projects in the fields of cultural, social and economic cooperation linked to such an initiative? Can the Commission present an assessment of the relevant aspects of its Wider Europe neighbourhood strategy in this context?
