Subject: VP/HR - Scenario for a security crisis caused by developments in Greece

The clear winners of the Greek elections of January 2015 were the left-wing Syriza Party, whose pre-election campaign was characterised by vehement opposition to further austerity measures and promises of debt relief from international creditors. Economic instability and perhaps even a Greek exit from EU structures could create security risks for the entire European Union.

Have the European External Action Service and the Commission developed a scenario for a security crisis that could arise in the region in such an event?
